1. Chinese Communist and North Korean military movements during the cease-fire talks consist of the following:
  - a. The withdrawal of decimated troop units from the front to Manchuria or North Korean rear areas, and their replacement with units which were formerly in combat, but which have been reorganized in northern Korea and Manchuria.
  - b. The repair of highway and rail transportation facilities, using large numbers of army engineer troops and civilian labor draftees.
  - c. The reorganization of the supply service, including the return to China of medical and transport personnel with over four months in the combat zone, and their replacement by new persons.
2. [REDACTED], he can prove conclusively that there has been no increase in the number of Chinese Communist troops in North Korea and that no new troops (i.e. troops not previously in combat in North Korea) have moved from China to Korea.
